Examiner's Comments
Business Associations

General comments

The standard of papers in this sitting of the Business Associations Conversion Examination was, overall, relatively high, with many candidates capable of providing coherent legal analysis.

As examiners, we expect candidates to be able to identify the legal issues in questions. Then they should identify the law that is relevant to the issues. They should also ask what the law means for their clients or advisees base on the facts as set out in the questions. The examination questions are designed to resemble as closely as possible what candidates may come across in practice.

Most Candidates finished the paper. I will now give some comments on how candidates answered each question. I will also describe where they did well and where they did less well.

Question 1

Almost everybody identified that the question was about directors' duties. Those candidates who did well for this question were able to subdivide the question into three separate legal issues relating to directors' duties. On the issue of delegation of director's duty, candidates who gave good answers not only pinpointed the relevant cases and statutory provisions, but were also able to point out that whether the delegation to Isabella was reasonable given her professional knowledge. Yet those who gave average or below average answers did not identify the relevant statutory provision (Section 465(2)) of the Companies Ordinance regarding the objective and subjective tests and nor did they discuss how or why the professions of the relevant parties are related to their level of liabilities.

On the issue of the no conflict rule, those candidates who did well were able to identify the relevant statutory provision relating to disclosure of material interests by the relevant director, and how this kind of contract becomes voidable merely by existence of such conflict based on case law. However, those who did relatively poorly simply mentioned that this was a conflict of interest but did not go on to elaborate their answers with reference to cases and statutory provision.

On the issue of using corporate information to make profit, candidates who did well were able to identify most of the relevant case laws and used those principles well to elaborate their analysis of the facts. A few even mentioned that if found liable, the company can hold the director accountable for the amount of profit made as a constructive trustee. Yet those who gave average answers did not provide coherent legal analysis with reference to relevant case laws. Some of those who answered poorly did not even identify or discuss this issue and jumped straight to the point that shareholders may resort derivative action.

Question 2

Almost all candidates identified that once registered a company becomes a separate legal entity and is distinguished from the shareholders. Majority of candidates also discussed the importance of the Salomon case in developing this legal principle. Candidates who got higher marks were able to discuss that commercial companies developed as a means of allowing a number of people to pool their resources to undertake an enterprise too large for a single individual. Creating a separate legal person to hold and incur the rights and obligations of the enterprise simplified dealings between the enterprise and those with whom it conducted business. While most candidates mentioned that the major advantage of forming a company is limited liability yet those who got lower marks did not go on to elaborate the meaning of limited liability.

Majority of the candidates were able to identify that this was a “lifting the corporate veil” issue. However, candidates who scored higher marks were able to refer to cases such as Adams v. Cape Industries, Daimler Co. v. Continental Tyre and Smith, Stone & Knight Ltd v Birmingham Corporation and provided a coherent legal analysis as to under what circumstances would the court lift the veil and hold the parent company liable for the action of the subsidiary.

Exceptional candidates even discussed the possibility that a company could be the agent or partner of its controller. Therefore, if a company (such as a subsidiary) were treated as the agent of a person who controlled it (such as the holding company), any rights or obligations of the company arising under the scope of the agency would be treated as rights or obligations of the controller.

Question 3

Most candidates identified that the question was about the articles of association and its enforceability. Those who did well for this question were able to differentiate members and outsiders of the company. Good answers pointed out that as an outsider, Casper, cannot enforce the terms of the article of association just as the rule of privity applies by referring to the relevant cases. Yet those candidates who did relatively poorly did not discuss this issue adequately, with a few of them unable to even spot this issue.

On the issue regarding the enforceability of the articles amongst shareholders themselves, candidates with good answers cited the relevant statutory provision and case law to support their arguments and how this is related to the factual problem. Yet those who gave poor answer simply mentioned that Angel can enforce the term against Ada and Philip based on “fairness”, which has never been the legal test. Some candidates mentioned that the term is enforceable between shareholders but did not cite the relevant statutory provision and case law to support their arguments.

On the issue relating to the alteration of articles, some candidates failed to identify this in the answer and were not discussed at all. Those who gave average or below average answers did identify the issue but argued that shareholders could resort to unfair prejudicial remedy to challenge the validity of the alteration. Although this may be relevant yet not the gist of the answer. Those who answered well for this part were able to cite the relevant statutory provision and explained that a company may by special resolution alter or add to its articles, providing that the power to alter is exercised “bona fide for the benefit of the company as a whole” (Section 88(2) Companies Ordinance) and supported its argument with reference to case law (Sidebottom v. Kershaw).

Question 4

Very few candidates attempted this question but those who did were able to point out that the relevant statute is the Companies (Winding Up and Miscellaneous Provisions) Ordinance (Cap 32). However, many of the answers failed to discuss the relevant statutory provisions and cases adequately.

In relation to the payment to TA by Daida, very few candidates cited the relevance of the validation order under section 182. Some candidates did mention the case of Chevalier (HK) Ltd v Joint Liquidators of Right Time Construction Co Ltd but failed to discuss its relevance to the factual problem.

On payment to Five Star, only a few candidates mentioned that the transaction could constitute unfair preference in the light of Cap 32 ss. 266 – 266D. Exceptional candidates mentioned that the new unfair preference provisions came into effect on 13 February 2017. Yet the overall legal analysis of this part was relatively weak by those who attempted this question.

Very few candidates discussed whether David could be considered as an “associate” by virtue of sections 265B or 256C.

Almost no candidate mentioned the relevance of Re Gray's Inn with regards to the dealing with the bank. Perhaps one or two candidates cited the Court of Appeal’s judgment in Super Speed Ltd (in liq) v Bank of Baroda with regards to the issue of bank loan to support their arguments.

Overall, the majority of those who attempted this question did relatively poorly without referring to the relevant statutory provisions and case laws to support their answers.
